CHAPTER I.

With an air of brusque impatience as if it had been some trifling matter, she turned to the table and laid down the book which she had been reading. "You are not listening to me," she said to the young man who was sitting opposite to

her. "I am listening to you," he replied, "but

you are not listening to

me." "You are not

listening to me," she

said, "I am listening to

ings piled high in the rear, all of which she was wearily persuaded, were in imminent danger of being jolted to the ground. They presently came to a gate in a barbed wire fence, and the young man, stopping the team, jumped out to open it.

"And shall I take the reins?" asked

Miss Elly, holding out her daintily gloved hands. He smiled, if somewhat condescending, evidently meant to be friendly.

"It would not mind," returning the smile with a smile. "And could you drive through the gate? The horses are perfectly good."

He was a handsome fellow as he smiled, Miss Elly noted as she drove by him—tall, slender, blond giant, with even, white teeth gleaming from his heavy mustache, a shadow brighter than his close cropped hair; with honest, laughing eyes, that looked straight into the heart of the hand in his frank assurance of cordial good will.

He was clothed in the gray corduroy popular among the cadet corps, the pan-talons tucked in the tops of a pair of high topped leather boots, his wide brimmed hat was turned up in front in that rakish but becoming cowboy fashion, the red silk handkerchief carelessly tucked into his neck supplying the place of a cravat. He had a pleasant smile, and a ready wit, and the artistic harmony of the whole contenance. It was a figure to study and the western landscape, she thought, with a glance toward the small, leather covered box to hold a tin of cosmetics. "If it had not for a couple of pistols and a low cut perforated belt, he might have been passing for a refined and cultured man. He was a good deal of a man, she thought, as he looked at her with his frank assurance of cordial good will.
